

Frank Lloyd Wright was born in Wisconsin in 1867. After studying engineering, he worked for an architect. His theory of “Form and Function Are One” would be the influence for his houses. They had a style all their own, horizontal with no basements or attics. Built with natural materials and never painted, Wright used low-pitched rooflines with deep overhangs and uninterrupted walls of windows to merge into their environments. His Falling Water house is well recognized as well as the fabulous Guggenheim Museum. He died at 92 in Arizona after becoming internationally recognized for his innovative building style and contemporary designs.
